He taunted Mr. Gladstone with being a leader whose majority depended upon the action of his allies, who were at the same time his masters. The Government, he claimed, had the right t point out the nature of that alliance, which was with a Nationalist party who had been squared and a Nationalist party who had not been aquared. He maintained that any attempt to govern Ireland under the ordinary law would prove : failure, and insinuated that Mr. Gladstone bad obtained the support of the Irish members b promising to release Daly and Egan from prison. He scouted the inquiry that had been made by the Nation into the condition of the evicted tenants in Ireland, and said that if those people were still roofless it was the fault of the Opposition. He was not surprised that the Liberal party had not revealed the details of their Home Rule Bill, because they did not know them themselves; but if they carried out half their promises they would make themselves a spectacle before the world.
